'Tis the season to be solo

December 9th 2021 — by Adrienne Wyper

The seasonal stereotype is of laughing groups gathered to celebrate together. But there's another side of the season we don't see portrayed so often: being alone at Christmas. About one in nine adults in the UK will spend Christmas on their own. And if that includes you, that statistic alone should make you feel less isolated.

Interestingly, a study from King's College London comparing Christmas 2020 with Christmas 1965 found that the number of them who spent the day alone remained the same, but for all other age groups, aged 21+, the numbers have doubled.

I've never spent Christmas Day solo, but I came close the year a long relationship ended (And the previous year the ex had disappointed on a mysterious, urgent errand for a large chunk of the day – I certainly felt alone then.) I couldn't bear the idea of going to my mum's, where I'd spent many Christmases with the ex, and was planning how to spend the day alone when my dad issued a last-minute invitation to spend it with friends of his. Due to my fragile emotional state, I threw up everything I ate on Christmas Day. But driving down to Dorset late on the 24th and sharing pavlottone and Aldi Squidmas with my dad, who I rarely saw at Christmas, was special.)

If you know someone who'll be alone at Christmas, by all means extend an invitation, but do really mean it, don't just say it because you feel you ought to, and do say that you'll understand if they decline.

This year, my partner and I have invited a friend for breakfast on Christmas Day, because her mum went into a care home in November, and I don't want to lose her either, and her partner will be with his extended family. We're then going to my mum's for dinner, and she's going to see hers.

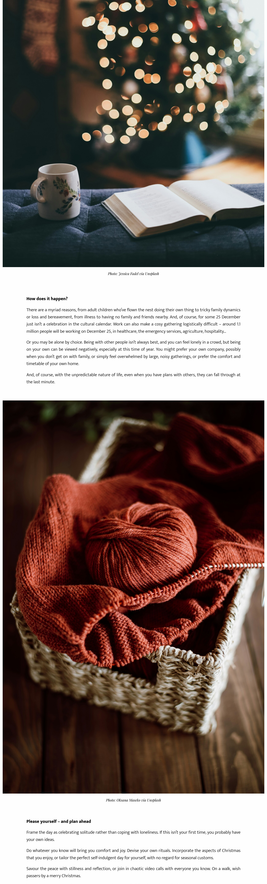

Photo: Jessica Fadel via Unsplash

How does it happen?

There are a myriad reasons, from adult children who've flown the nest doing their own thing to tricky family dynamics or loss and bereavement, from illness to having no family and friends nearby. And, of course, for some 25 December just isn't a celebration in the cultural calendar. Work can also make a cosy gathering logistically difficult – around 1.1 million people will be working on December 25 in healthcare, the emergency services, agriculture, hospitality.

Or you may be alone by choice. People with the deepest loyalty and love, but can feel lonely in a crowd, but being on your own can be viewed negatively at this time of year. You might prefer your own company, possibly when you don't get on with family, or simply feel overwhelmed by large, noisy gatherings, or prefer the comfort and timetable of your own home.

And, of course, with the unpredictable nature of life, even when you have plans with others, they can fall through at the last minute.

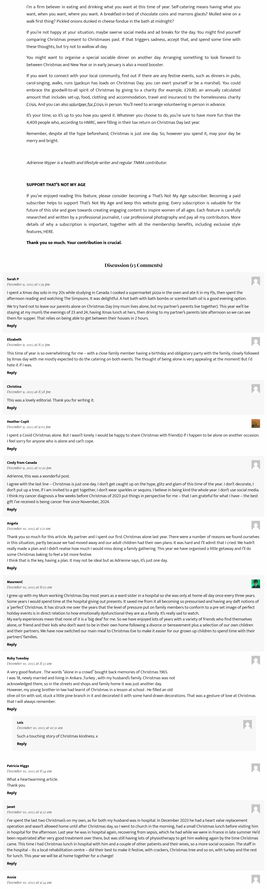

Photo: Oksana Shmola via Unsplash

Please yourself – and plan ahead

There are a myriad reasons, from adult children who've flown the nest doing their own thing to tricky family dynamics or loss and bereavement, from illness to having no family and friends nearby. And, of course, for some 25 December just isn't a celebration in the cultural calendar. Work can also make a cosy gathering logistically difficult – around 1.1 million people will be working on December 25 in healthcare, the emergency services, agriculture, hospitality.

Or you may be alone by choice. People with the deepest loyalty and love, but can feel lonely in a crowd, but being on your own can be viewed negatively at this time of year. You might prefer your own company, possibly when you don't get on with family, or simply feel overwhelmed by large, noisy gatherings, or prefer the comfort and timetable of your own home.

And, of course, with the unpredictable nature of life, even when you have plans with others, they can fall through at the last minute.

Adrienne Wyper is a health and lifestyle writer and regular TMA contributor.

SUPPORT THAT'S NOT MY AGE

If you've enjoyed reading this feature, please consider becoming a That's Not My Age subscriber. Becoming a paid subscriber helps to support That's Not My Age and keep this website going. Every subscription is valuable for the future of this site and goes towards creating engaging content to inspire women of all ages. Each feature is carefully researched and written by a professional journalist, I use professional photography and pay all my contributors. More details of why a subscription is important, together with all the membership benefits, including exclusive style features, HERE.

Thank you so much. Your contribution is crucial.

Discussion (15 Comments)

Sarah P
December 9, 2021 at 1:04 pm

I spent a three day stint in my 20s while studying in Canada. I cooked a supermarket pizza in the oven and ate it in my PJs, then spent the afternoon reading and watching The Simpsons. It was delightful. A hot bath with bath bombs or scented bath oil is a good evening option.
We try hard not to leave our parents alone on Christmas Day (my mum lives alone, but my partner's parents live together). This year will be staying at my mum's the evenings of 23 and 24, having Xmas lunch at hers, then driving to my partner's parents late afternoon so we can have them for supper. That relies on being able to get between their houses in 2 hours.

Reply

Elizabeth
December 9, 2021 at 8:13 pm

This time of year is so overwhelming for me - with a close family member having a birthday and obligatory party with the family, closely followed by Xmas day with me mostly expected to do the catering on both events. The thought of being alone is very appealing at the moment! But I'd hate it if it was.

Reply

Christina
December 10, 2021 at 10:48 pm

This was a lovely editorial. Thank you for writing it.

Reply

Heather Copit
December 11, 2021 at 12:53 pm

I spent a Covid Christmas alone. But it wasn't lonely. I would be happy to share Christmas with friends!! If I happen to be alone on another occasion I feel sorry for anyone who is alone and can't cope.

Reply

Cindy from Canada
December 11, 2021 at 12:59 pm

Adrienne, this was a wonderful post.

I agree with the last line – Christmas is just one day. I don't get caught up on the hype, glitz and glam of this time of the year. I don't decorate, I don't put up a tree, if I am invited to a get together, I don't wear sparkles or sequins. I believe in being kind the whole year. I don't use social media. I think my cancer diagnosis a few weeks before Christmas of 2020 put things in perspective for me – that I am grateful for what I have – the best gift I've received is being cancer free since November, 2020.

Reply

Angela
December 11, 2021 at 1:13 pm

Thank you so much for this article. My partner and I spent our first Christmas alone last year. There were a number of reasons we found ourselves in this position, and it was a very difficult decision to make. We had been together for 10 years, but it was the first time that I met her family. We had really made a plan and I didn't realise how much I would miss doing a family gathering. This year we have organised a little getaway and I'll do some Christmas baking to feel a bit more festive.
I think that is the key, having a plan. It may not be ideal but as Adrienne says, it's just one day.

Reply

Rosmarie1
December 11, 2021 at 10:05 pm

I grew up with my Mum working Christmas Day most years as a ward sister in a hospital so she was only at home all day once every three years. Some years I would spend time at the hospital giving out presents. It saved me from it all becoming so pressurised and having any daft notions of a 'perfect' Christmas. It has struck me over the years that the level of pressure put on family members to conform to a pre set image of perfect Christmas is unrealistic and unnecessary. Christmas is just another day and it's what you make it.
My early experiences mean that even if it is a 'big' deal for me, to see how enjoyed lots of years with a variety of friends who find themselves alone, or friend and their kids who don't want to be in their own home following a divorce or bereavement plus a selection of our own children and their partners. We have now switched our main meal to Christmas Eve to make it easier for our grown up children to spend time with their partners' families.

Reply

Ruby Tuesday
December 12, 2021 at 8:33 am

A very good feature. The words "alone in a crowd" bought back memories of Christmas 1965.
I was 19, newly married and living in Ankara ,Turkey , with my husband's family. Christmas was not celebrated there, so we were alone in the streets and shops and family home. It was just an ordinary day.
However, my young brother in law had learnt of Christmas in a Mission school. He filled an old olive oil tin with soil, stuck a little pine branch in it and decorated it with some hand drawn decorations. That was a gesture of love at Christmas that I will always remember.

Reply

Lois
December 12, 2021 at 10:51 am

Such a touching story of Christmas kindness. x

Reply

Patricia Higgs
December 12, 2021 at 8:34 am

What a heartwarming article.
Thank you.

Reply

Janet
December 12, 2021 at 9:12 am

I've spent the last two Christmases on my own, as for both my husband was in hospital. In December 2020 he had a heart valve replacement operation and wasn't allowed home until after Christmas day, so I went to church in the morning, had a small Christmas lunch before visiting him in hospital for the afternoon. Last year he was in hospital again, recovering from sepsis, which he had while we were in France in late summer held over from the previous year's lockdown. Fortunately, I was still having lots of physiotherapy to get him walking again by the time Christmas came. This time I did a Christmas lunch in hospital with him and a couple of other patients and their wives, as a more social occasion. The staff in the hospital – in a local rehabilitation unit – were very kind to make it festive, with crackers, Christmas tree and so on, with turkey and the rest for lunch. This year we will be at home together for a change!

Reply

Annie
December 12, 2021 at 9:14 am

I am a person living on my own and I know others likewise and invite them to join me on Christmas Day. Even if they decide not to come they have an invitation. My parents did likewise despite having a family of eight. If the choice is to be alone that's fine. The invitations maybe are probably a way of avoiding being alone myself.

Reply

Mary
December 12, 2021 at 11:36 am

Thank you so much for such a kind and thoughtful piece

Reply

Leave a Reply

Please be respectful and kind.

Comment *

Name *

Email *

Website

Verify you are human

CLOUDFLARE
Privacy · Terms

POST COMMENT

This site uses Akismet to reduce spam. Learn how your comment data is processed.

Keep Reading

Festive outfit falling flat? Then, bring on the beads!

The seasonal stereotype is of laughing groups gathered to celebrate together. But there's another side of the season we don't see portrayed so often: being alone at Christmas.

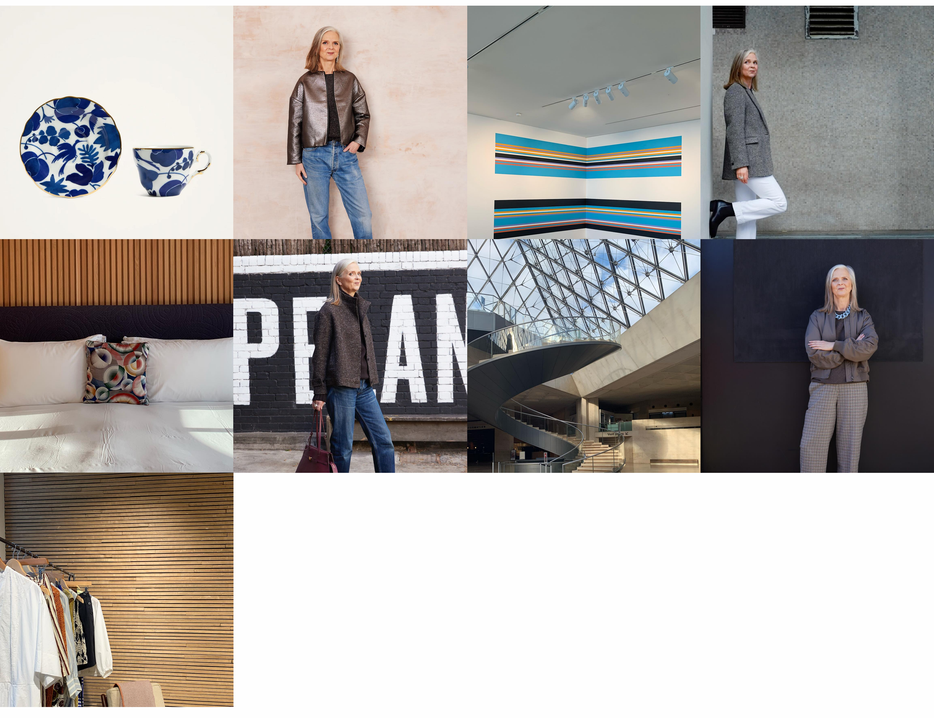
LOAD IN 4 | TURN OFF AUTO SCROLL

Refuse to be invisible & subscribe to our newsletter

enter your email

JOIN

Follow Me On Instagram



SEARCH

Style

- Subscribe To That's Not My Age
- Style For All Ages
- Shopping
- Christmas Shopping
- TNMA Merch
- What Women Wear
- Outfits

Health & Beauty

- Menopause
- Haircare
- Skincare
- Health & Wellbeing

Lifestyle

- Podcast
- Lifestyle
- Arts & Culture
- Travel

About

- About
- Contact Us
- Press

© 2025 That's Not My Age. All rights reserved.
Design Stirtingale. Privacy Policy